PERSONAL INFORMATION

I graduated in Economics at the University of Venice in 1992. After a period of work in French and Italian industrial and consulting firms (1990-99), I switched to the Academic career, taking a Ph.D. in Economic History at the University of Verona (IT), and a Postdoctoral Fellowship at the University of Padua, IT (1999-2005). Afterwards worked as researcher at the Universities of Padua (Economic History), of Hertfordshire, UK (Textile History), and at the KazNU “Al Farabi” of Almaty, KZ (Economic History).

I hold the qualification of “Maître de Conférence” in Early Modern and Modern History for the French universities and of Associated Professor in Economic History (Professore Associato) for the Italian universities. My research interests have focused on Economic and Social History, with particular attention to textile history, the history of industrialization processes, and of ports, arsenals and trade in Early Modern Adriatic and Eastern Mediterranean. In this context I have tackled such historiographical issues as the role of pluri – activity in rural households, the causes and long term consequences of the social and national division of labour, the paths of emergence of agro – industrial sectors (e.g. hemp and flax), the role of institution, technological transfer and labour organization in promoting economic growth, the coexistence in time and space of different path of development. I am now looking at the world of luxury textile (garments, and secondary products as high quality yarns and dyestuffs) as an innovative research object, shedding new light on global social and economic relations.

My researches have been realised using a broad range of multi – lingual sources. In this context fluency in five European languages, including Russia, and my ability to read Dutch and Spanish are important assets that have enabled me to exploit wide range of sources, build scientific dialog with foreign scholars, and foster networks at international level. Along with traditional, printed documents, I have used interviews, letters and diaries, cloths samples, rural, urban and industrial heritage. I am author of five monographic works and of more than 43 scientific articles and contributions published in Italy, France and Russia. My researches have been presented at 62 scientific conferences in Europe, Russia, Kazakhstan, the USA, and South Africa.

Along with research activities, since 2005 I have been teaching Economic History of Developing Countries and Local Development at the University of Padua, and, in the Academic Year 2015-16, Sustainable Development at the University KazNU “Al Farabi” of Almaty.
